

Promises from my side

1. Your mental health is my priority.

I've seen multiple cries for help on social media from the students. These are mainly due to anxiety and confusion about their upcoming future. As of now, there's no clear system to deal with such serious situations which need immediate attention. I'll try to bring in professionals with a background of career and general advising onto the social platforms such as Google Meet where help sessions can be conducted.

2. Making sure that the problems faced by the students reaches the administration.

One of my main priority will be to set up a platform where students can address their issues, even anonymously. I'll then proceed without further delay to make sure that all the queries will reach the administration.

3. Teaming up with secretary-Academic help so that no voice goes unheard.

I believe that a group of people with similar goals always make a strong team. If I become the secretary of Community and Crisis, I can definitely team up with the academic help secretary and also General Secretary of Student Welfare so that we can raise the voices of those in need up to such a level that the administration heeds to it.

4. Hosting Open Mic sessions.

Online college life can be pretty boring and lonely. These problems can be curbed by conducting open mic sessions where people can show up and express their views, share experiences and showcase their talents. Afterall, who doesn't love a fine evening where we can all group up to talk and to relax?

5. Bridging the gap between students from different parts of the country.

I feel this is a topic of much greater importance but still it is overlooked. It is really difficult to overcome language barriers especially during online classes and as a result some students might feel left out. So as a member of student welfare subcommittee, I'll try my level best to ensure seamless interaction between students through workshops and similar strategies
